Adobe Photoshop CC has the potential for being our best iteration yet. We are excited about the rich integration of the Corel tools on top of their wonderful editor, and the ability to adapt their for-fee tools to free-software under the Apache license. Adobe Creative Cloud holds a lot of promise, and we are looking forward to seeing their efforts bear fruit.

Finally, I have to give a shout-out to the team at The Imaging Resource for all the news and events that they have kept us abreast of over the past few months. You guys rock and we appreciate all the hard work that you guys have invested in Adobe's development platform and the CC vision.

Thank you.

Well, this is an update for ones who also enjoy the use of various tools that are included in the Adobe Photoshop Collection (a set of Photoshop and Illustrator plugins). This update should basically let you breathe a bit because there have been quite a number of enhancements and changes, including the new Automate Action. After testing the beta of Photoshop 5.5 in late 2009, I have a good idea of how this version will perform on a standalone Mac. Although the Mac version has benefited from some of the changes I've reported from the Windows version, overall, I'm not sure there's enough of a one-to-one mapping between the Mac and Windows versions to call it an app-for-app equivalent. That said, the program's frequent updates and the ability to create one-click export presets for the Mac version make it worth a look for those working with the Mac.
