Lightroom.net has been a brilliant site targeted at professional photographers. There are dozens of how-tos, news about the dslr equipment market and links to other sites.

Sadly, iPhotos has replaced it.

What?

Well, it doesn't have what this site has now. It doesn't have a section regarding the aging Sony A6600. So instead, I'm just going to direct you to Sony A6600 reviews instead.

If you're in the homebrew dslr market, then there's a section over there for you as well.

Besides, your comments while I was away were rather funny. You know who you are :-P

Image editing software like Photoshop and other professional tools, including Photoshop's 3D capabilities, have been very expensive. But Adobe is always looking for ways to lower the barrier to entry, and it's releasing tools to democratize its technology.
