wpa/wpa2-enterprise is a two-way encryption protocol. when a client (another computer on the network) tries to connect to a wpa/ wpa2-enterprise network, a handshake occurs between the client and the access point. during the handshake, the client and the access point exchange encryption keys, known as the key information packet (or kip). hackers use these handshake packets to decrypt the traffic and thus gain access to the network. it is possible to capture these handshake packets using network sniffers. in order to capture these packets, a hacker must first obtain access to the computer that is trying to connect to the network. the second part of the attack is to obtain access to a network with which the client is attempting to connect. this is not an easy task, as it requires hacking into a computer. successful cracking wpa/ wpa2 -psk requires access to the handshake packets. this is accomplished by capturing the handshake packets from the client computer, decrypting them and then attempting to crack the encryption. the attack is known as a dictionary attack. dictionary attacks use a list of all possible wpa/ wpa2 passphrases, and try to crack the encryption for each of the passphrases. the wpa/wpa2-enterprise handshake packet includes a field called 802.11i, which specifies some additional security features for the encryption. this can make it more difficult to crack the encryption. the 802.11i security features are called the 4-way handshake, reserved mac addresses and wep. the reserved mac addresses are an essential part of the wpa/wpa2-enterprise handshake. they are the destination mac address and source mac address of the wireless frames sent to and from the access point.
