research into organic electroluminescent elements has progressed, a high-intensity, short-wavelength light source that operates at a lower driving voltage than conventional light sources, for example, has been provided. The organic electroluminescent element has, as a principle, a structure in which a fluorescent or phosphorescent organic compound is sealed between an anode and a cathode. Examples of the organic electroluminescent element include an element that has a structure in which a hole-transporting layer containing a diamine derivative compound, a light-emitting layer containing a tetracene derivative and an electron-transporting layer containing a perylene derivative are laminated, as disclosed in Patent Document 1. A wide variety of compounds are known as organic electroluminescent materials. For example, a wide variety of materials from fluorescent materials such as anthracene and coumarin to phosphorescent materials such as iridium complex, platinum complex and phenylpyridine complex are disclosed in Patent Document 2 and other literature. Patent Document 3 discloses an element having a structure in which a hole-transporting layer containing a diamine derivative compound and an electron-transporting layer containing a perylenetetracene derivative are laminated. Patent Document 4 describes, for example, a hole-injecting electrode with improved durability that contains a lithium salt and is formed of an oxide film
