However, that's not even close to the whole picture. The idea of using the source code itself for editing is nothing new to Adobe. After all, this used to be the way we developed apps in the 90s. The problem is that in the earlier days, we thought about what would be feasible for users and what could be done with a small piece of our app. This was a great approach for pre-internet users. But for the modern workplace, we have to think about user experience much more than that. "The good news is: we have gotten used to using computers for so long it is now very natural to work with software applications, and we can benefit from technology in ways we cannot yet imagine." — Thomas Hardjono Over the years, Adobe has leveraged a variety of technologies and methodologies to push the boundaries of what is possible in the browser. And all of this work has been paid off.
