August 11, 2014 at 6:59 pm.Establishment of a Hepatocellular Carcinoma Cell Line From a Rat and Characterization of Its Biological and Immunological Properties. Rat hepatocellular carcinoma has been well established by the injection of a diethylnitrosamine solution into the femoral vein of the rat. A rat of the black strain possesses a different genetic background from that of the white strain. Therefore, a diethylnitrosamine-induced rat hepatocellular carcinoma cell line was established from the black strain and designated DNM-7. The cell line, DNM-7, had a spindle-like shape, grew in a monolayer, and was positive for liver-specific products. The tumor-forming ability of the cell line was examined by a scid/scid mouse hepatocarcinogenesis assay and a transplantation of the cell line into a rat liver. DNM-7 cells formed tumors in both cases, demonstrating that this cell line can be a good and reliable model for studying the growth characteristics of rat hepatocellular carcinoma. Further, a potential antigen for an antibody-based immunotherapy was identified by cloning analysis of tumor-specific transcripts. One of the clones, designated Hc11, was stably established and maintained its tumor-forming ability. In addition, the differentiation characteristics of Hc11 cells were analyzed and compared with those of the original cell line, DNM-7. DNM-7 and Hc11 cells were positive for albumin and alpha-fetoprotein, negative for transferrin, positive for AFP-L3, reacted to glypican-3, and reacted to several hepatocyte-specific and tumor-specific antigens, all of which were liver-specific. However, the glypican-3 and the AFP-L3 ant
