Vitamin C is an essential nutrient with potential anticancer properties. We assessed the impact of 6 mo of daily oral vitamin C supplementation on quality of life (QOL) and fatigue in breast cancer survivors. We enrolled patients (n = 447) in a 2-by-2 randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled trial. Breast cancer patients in the intervention group received two daily 800 mg vitamin C doses, followed by 6 mo of daily maintenance vitamin C doses (800 mg). QOL and fatigue were assessed using validated measures at baseline, and at 3 and 6 mo. Study analysis was performed on an intention-to-treat basis. We found no significant overall effect of vitamin C on global QOL (P = 0.42) and fatigue (P = 0.34), although we did observe a positive effect on QOL when we studied specific areas. Compared with the placebo group, the intervention group experienced significant improvements in QOL for several specific areas of functioning, including vitality (P = 0.01), emotional well-being (P = 0.04), financial (P = 0.04), and then left to perform miracles
