fell 10 percent in May amid a strong housing market, a natural pause for the industry and a reminder of how low the market has been lately. During the recession and earlier this decade, automakers had been spending heavily to make vehicles that attracted buyers. That resulted in a near-record number of vehicles available for sale. But now, automakers have much better incentives to offer customers. As a result, they're selling fewer cars to buyers willing to shell out the cash, waiting for the market to rebound. For the industry as a whole, March and April were the best months for sales in the U.S. in nearly
