Presently, statistical methods are used to analyze the relationship between nursing diagnoses (NDs) and interventions. The purpose of this article was to test the application of a content analysis for nursing care planning that examines the frequency of nursing diagnoses, type of interventions and type of administration (externally or internally). A case study was conducted at the Hospital Universitário de Maringá (HU-Maringá). The study was carried out in a unit of the Hospital between October 2010 and March 2011. Twenty records of patients (12 patients for each case) were selected. For each patient, the following data were extracted: gender, age, medical diagnoses, reason for hospitalization and number of interventions. Two researchers conducted the content analysis in three stages. The first stage involved reading the medical record to identify nursing diagnoses
